Currently, there is a gap of information for opioid use involving pregnant women along with how the infant's health and development is possibly compromised as a result of the opioid exposure during pregnancy. The opioid epidemic is not only affecting adults, but can have lasting effects on the smallest victims in this crisis. There is a concern for the short term and long-term effects as well as the strategies needed for the infant to reach all the developmental milestones with the proper supports. The information shared at this workshop will inform and prepare pregnant women with opioid use disorder to care for their infant. This training will also assist professionals working with the infants and their families to create plans for a brighter future for the infants. Participants will recognize the developmental disabilities and congenital disabilities that result from in utero opioid exposure; they will be able to describe the short-term and long-term effects from the infant being exposed to opioids; and they will learn to construct effective plans that support and enhance the development of the infant.
